Puppe of Larva - Jugl

The pupa changes into a butterfly.

Length about 489 feet.

Signe is tired of her home in the country. One fine morning she therefore leaves her troubled parents and goes to the city with her few belongings.

Immediately on her arrival in the city she does not know what to do, whether she shall let a porter or a flat-catcher assist her, fortunately a policeman comes along and helps her out of the dilemma.

Through a registry-office she gets a situation as kitchen-maid in a restaurant, where the drastic way, in which she keeps her suitors at a distance is approved of by everybody except the suitors themselves.

The direction of her first steps in the life of amusement in the city are taken in hand by a fellow-servant. They go to a dancing-place, and it is not the very best company Signe here joins, and she also soon gets tired of it. A young gentleman who happens to be there as a looker on, discovers the fresh-looking peasant-girl.

At first it is not all disinterestedness, that makes him allure Signe to go with him, but when he sees her helplessness and discovers, how innocent she is, his feelings take a different direction.

We meet Signe again in a comfortable little home, which her friend has established for her. She has blossomed into a beautiful, beaming young lady, there is nothing left now of the clumsy peasantgirl, Signes friend visits her, but their happy encounter is suddenly disturbed by the young gentleman's father, who comes to part the two young people. But he is quite unsuccessful. The two young people stand together. Signe is taken faint, and the old doctor who is called to attend to her declares, that the only thing to be done is to unite the two, and at last the old gentleman gives his consent.

The last picture shows the little family two years later on an excursion. The old gentleman is very happy and does not want to part with his son's little daughter, and Signes old mother is crying with joy over the happiness of her daughter.
